GOLF GAME TIPS

Tip 1: Putting Mistakes.

Becoming a great putter isn't easy. It takes focus, determination, and hours of hard work on the practice green. However, by avoiding the most common mistakes that amateur golfers make on the dance floor you can make some big steps forward without too much effort.

Here are the top 4 putting mistakes to avoid...

Not having a pre-shot routine. It doesn't need to be anything fancy, you've got to have a pre-shot routine. For mine I simply stand behind the ball to pick my line, walk up to the ball and make 2-3 practice swings looking at the hole, address the ball with my right hand on my putter grip first then my left, settle into place, take one last look at the hole, and then make my stroke – every single time.

You're not relaxed. Tension is one of the biggest enemies of great putts. If any part of your body (especially your hands and arms) is clenched too tightly you're going to have a hard time stroking the ball consistently. To loosen up let your arms drop to your sides and go dead - then grip your putter and try to feel the weight of the club head.

You're not taking dead aim. It's amazing how many golfers I see who just don't pay enough attention to where they are aiming on the putting green. Take the time to line up your putt from behind the ball and visualize how it will roll into the hole. Then use the alignment aids on your putter to help you square your club face up to the target, and don't forget to align your feet and shoulders as well.

You're not practicing properly. Many golfers I see on the practicing green are just aimlessly whacking a few balls from one hole to another without much thought to it. If you really want to improve your putting you've got to focus on actually making putts, and that means focusing on those pesky 3-4 footers first.

If you can focus on avoiding these common putting mistakes you'll find yourself rolling more birdie and par putts into the bottom of the cup, and improving your scores!

Tip 2: Your Chips.

Those short little chip shots should be easy...so how come they are so hard to control? Some of them go too far, some of them don't go far enough. Some of them pop up too high, some of them don't get high enough.

What gives???

Consistently controlling your chip shots is a key to getting up and down and shooting your lowest scores, and it's easier than you might think.

Focus on these simple tips to keep your chip shots under control...

Start by loading your weight on your lead leg. For right handed golfers this means starting your swing with the majority of your weight on your left leg. This may sound backwards, but with a small swing like a chip a weight transfer is not necessary, and you'll be able to avoid a lot of unnecessary movement by starting with the majority of your weight on your lead leg.

Control your distance with the length of your backswing. Too many of the golfers I see try to control how far their chip shots travel by swinging harder or softer. This is EXTREMELY difficult to do consistently. Instead focus on controlling the distance of your chip shots just like you do on your putts - with the length of your backswing. For a short chip use a short backswing, for a long chip use a longer backswing. And remember, ALWAYS accelerate the club head through the ball.

Keep a strong lead wrist through impact. For right handed golfers letting your left wrist collapse and flipping your club head through impact is one of the most sure fire ways to lose control over your chip shots and launch them way to high in the air. Instead keep your lead wrist strong and ahead of the club head as it passes through the impact zone only letting it break after your ball has landed on the green.

Practice these 3 tips next time you're on the chipping green and before you know it you'll be getting up and down and turning those bogeys into pars!
